THEY'RE STILL COMING!!

AS THE POLICE APPROACH
THE FALLEN BIRD, THERE
IS AN EXPLOSION FROM A BOMB-LIKE OBJECT IN ITS CLAW...

CLOUDS OF CHOKING GAS
STRANGLE THE COPS AS THE BIRDS SMASH THRU
THE EMBASSY WINDOW...

PANDEMONIUM BREAKS LOOSE.
GAS BOMBS FALL EVERYWHERE...
WITH LIGHTNING ACTION THE THIEVING BIRDS SNATCH AT THE SPARKLING GEMS...

MARTHA, LOSING DARREL
DANE IN THE CONFUSION FALLS EASY PREY TO THE VULTURE!!

AS THE MARAUDERS OF THE AIR WING THEIR WAY BACK...
LEAVING UNCONSCIOUS MEN AND WOMEN BEHIND, THE DOLL MAN SPRINGS INTO ACTION...
EVERY MUSCLE READY FOR BATTLE...

DARTING BULLET-LIKE THROUGH THE AIR, DOLL MAN LEAPS UPON THE BACK OF A PASSING RAIDER FALCON...

BUT THE BIRD TURNS ON HIM...

FIGHTING FURIOUSLY, HE TIES THE FEET OF THE FALCON WITH HIS CAPE TO PROTECT HIMSELF FROM ITS DANGEROUS CLAWS...

...AND WITH HIS BELT HE MAKES REINS...

I CAN'T JUMP ON THE VULTURE... HE MIGHT DROP MARTHA... I'LL LET THIS BIRD FLY ME TO HIS HIDE-OUT AND TAKE CARE OF HIM THERE !!!

AT LAST THEY REACH AN OLD DESERTED HOUSE...

THE FALCONS FLY INTO A CAGE, TRAPPING THE DOLL MAN WITH THEM...

AS FALCON AFTER FALCON ATTEMPT TO DRIVE THEIR SHARP BEAKS INTO HIM...

DOLL MAN DARTS ASIDE
IN TIME...

THAT TAKES CARE OF THEM!!

DOLL MAN'S STUNT ENRAGES
THE BIRDS .. AND THE FALCONS FIGHT AMONG THEMSELVES ...

GOOD CHANCE
WHILE THEY'RE FIGHTING... IF I CAN BEND
THIS STEEL!!

HE LEFT THROUGH THAT DOOR!!

THE DOLL MAN LEAPS
FOR THE DOOR KNOB...

LOCKED IN DOLL MAN STRAINS
HIS MUSCLES, TRYING TO FORCE THE DOOR OPEN...

SOLID STEEL!!
CAN'T BUDGE
IT!!

I CAN'T GET OUT!!
SOMEWHERE WITHIN THIS HOUSE MARTHA IS A PRISONER...
THERE MUST BE SOMETHING I CAN

AS THE POLICE BURST INTO THE ROOM DOLLMAN DISAPPEARS. UNKNOWN TO OTHERS, HE BECOMES DARREL DANE!

Darrel Dane let the phone ring four times. He picked up the extension in his laboratory with a vicious jerk. He was in no mood for interruptions; for ten solid hours he had been bending over his microscope, intent upon following the erratic course of a most illusive germ—which had been eluding him for that many days.

"Yes!" he barked into the instrument.

"Darrel!" came the plaintive feminine voice over the wire. "I'm frightened, and I just know that something dreadful's happened!"

"Oh—Martha!" Darrel's voice was an apology. Martha Roberts was his fiancée. "Please forgive the old bear, but you see . . ."

"Listen, Darrel," interrupted Martha, "Father didn't come home last night. He . . . come right over!"

Darrel was striding into the Roberts' library within ten minutes. He had been doing a lot of thinking on the way over. Dr. Roberts was a fine chap, although somewhat eccentric. He loved just two things—his daughter Martha and his profession; he dabbled in various experiments in his spare time. He was at work at this moment, Darrel remembered, on some sort of paralysis ray machine.

"Two men called on Dad last morning," Martha explained. "They said they were from the War Office. And Dad left with them. He hasn't come back."

"H'mmm!" said Darrel. "Didn't even call you?"

Martha shook her head. Her firm little chin quivered. Darrel put a protecting arm about her.

"Easy does it," he soothed. "Some business matter holding him up, I'll wager."

But Darrel didn't really believe that. "Roberts' Ray" had received too much publicity; foreign powers knew about it. In fact, several agents of Europe's warring nations had approached him recently, making large offers. Foul play afoot, Darrel figured.

"I'll get busy right now," he told Martha. "In the meantime I want you to stop worrying, little one."

Martha smiled up at him. "You'll find him, I know you will Darrel!"

The first thing Darrel Dane did was to search the doctor's laboratory thoroughly. He found nothing out of place, and was about to leave when he noticed that the heavy steel door of the built-in vault was open a crack. That was where Dr. Roberts kept his precious machine when he was not busy working on it. A glance showed Darrel that the machine was gone!

Checking with the War Department in Washington, Darrel learned that no agent had visited Dr. Roberts in weeks.

"So that's it!" said Darrel to himself.

Darrel picked up a clue late that afternoon: a panel delivery truck had been halted outside the Roberts' home about seven o'clock that morning. It was a gray truck, with a wide blue stripe encircling its body.

Young Dane began a check of companies owning such trucks, and his search simmered down to the Valet Laundry Service, which operated a chain of such trucks. A phone call to their plant revealed that one of their drivers had not returned from his route.

Darrel didn't call the police. He simply got a record of the missing driver's route, and started out on a systematic search in his car.

It was near ten that night when he ran down the abandoned vehicle, parked along a lonely road about five miles out in the country. The driver was slumped over on the seat, shot through the head.

A hundred yards back from the road, almost hidden in a dense grove of maples, stood a dilapidated farm house. Darrel made his way toward the house, wary and alert for stakeouts. He encountered none, and soon he was peering in a boarded-up window on the first floor. There was no light inside, but he sensed the presence of people close by. He also felt that there would be more than two men; the ray machine weighed about three hundred pounds.

There were three doors leading into the house. They were all heavily bolted and boarded over, the boards being fitted into grooves on the inside of the frames.

But this was no barrier for the amazing Darrel Dane, who could, upon occasion, slip through a three-inch grating.

Seemingly without effort on his part, a strange thing happened to young Dane, witnessed only by a watery moon swimming through a mass of tearful clouds hanging low over the countryside. He began to shrink! From his powerful six feet three, his body dwindled, almost in an instant, to a height of eighteen inches.

It was an easy matter to slip between the crack of two planks covering a window. Dane climbed down on a convenient chair inside, then slid down the leg like a Polynesian descending a palm tree.

"The cellar first," said the tiny man to himself.

The cellar door, bolted on the inside, led from the kitchen. Dane found a clothes shoot in one wall, but the square shaft was fully twenty inches across, and the walls perfectly smooth, polished by years of soiled linen traveling to the basement.

Darrel fastened a length of clothes line to the sink and tossed the rope into the shaft. Then he started down. A heap of old clothes at the foot of the shaft barred his passage, and he began wriggling through them.

His head broke into light after a moment, but the light came from another section of the cellar. Quickly he scrambled free and raced across the concrete floor. The lighted room was large, at least forty feet long and half that in width. At the far end, sitting on the edge of a vegetable bin, were five men—foreigners of official bearing. To one side of the room stood a small table and seated at it were two men—a squat, heavy-jowled fellow and Dr. Roberts. The squat man was speaking, in thick gutturals.

"We offer you one hundred thousand dollars, Dr. Roberts, for your machine. But as you know, we have it here, and if you refuse, we'll simply resort to—ah—confiscation. What is your answer?"

Roberts said, heatedly, "You fools! For the hundredth time, no! Do you think I'm a traitor? My invention is for the United States Government, and by heaven, it is going to get it!"

The squat man nodded toward the others. Two of them stepped forward. One of them held a gun.

"You will not reconsider, Herr Doktor?" he grated. "We must dispose of you, in the event that we take your machine without your consent!"

The squat man interrupted:

"You have only to sign that agreement in front of you, doctor, and the check will be placed in your hands . . . and you'll be freed."

"No!" screamed Roberts. "Go ahead and shoot me if you want to, but I'll never turn that machine over to your dirty government!"

"Ah!" sighed the gunman. "Then Herr Nichol, shall I—"

"Listen to me, you fools!" interrupted Roberts, "even if you do take the machine you can't use it. That's merely a working model, as I've told you, and it lacks the essential coils to make it work. Those coils, thank heaven, are in a safe place."

The squat man—Nichol—conferred in a foreign tongue with his henchmen.

In the meantime, Darrel Dane, tiny figure of a man, had been busy. He had witnessed the little drama through the crack in the door, which was partly open. And he realized that the situation was growing desperate. The doctor's life was definitely in danger. These men meant business. Carefully, making not a sound, he crept around the door and began moving toward the ray machine, which sat in one corner of the room.

The conference ended. The squat man came toward the machine; the others remained on their perch, like a flock of vultures waiting for the kill. The doctor, who was tied in his chair, sat with head bowed over the table.

"We'll test the machine on its inventor," the squat man rasped.

(Then a strange thing happened. From the twin lenses of the machine sprang two beams of bright red light. The light flooded over the squat man and his comrades. And without a sound they dropped in their tracks—paralyzed.)

The doctor looked up. Standing on top of the ray machine was the tiny man. He waved a hand, grinning.

"The Doll Man!" gasped the doctor. "Thank heaven, somehow I knew something would happen!"

Darrel Dane assumed his normal size and came forward. As he slit the ropes binding Dr. Roberts, he said wryly, "Next time you get kidnaped with your machine, you'd better leave those coils at home, really!"
